Tripura has been recognised globally as a leading state in e-governance and is a member of the Committee of Administrators for the International e-Regulations Agency (IeRA). Since its inception TRIDI is a single source of information for all stakeholders of the state. The state of Connecticut is planning to expand the universal background checks law to include private gun sales. After a meeting with Gov. Dannel Malloy (D) on March 1, Rep. Burt Cohen (D-Bridgeport) will present the governor with a bill that will make these purchases, as well as rentals or exchanges, subject to the same background check requirements. Currently, selling a gun or taking other non-licensed steps to sell a gun to a person known to be prohibited by the state from obtaining firearms, including convicted felons and domestic abusers, is not subject to background checks, even if those transactions involve multiple parties. "The proposal goes beyond what other states have done," Malloy said. "It would address the concerns that we have around prohibited persons, about access." Although adults who are legally prohibited from possessing a firearm can legally own them in some states, reporting these guns to the National Criminal Information Center, which runs the background check system, is not mandatory. So some gun owners in these states have had their legal guns sold to them without a background check. Connecticut's new law will require dealers to submit the sales to the NCIC by May 1, and close any sales to prohibited individuals whose names are on the NCIC within three days after being alerted to the sale by the background check system. Connecticut Attorney General George Jepsen (D) is considering filing an injunction to prevent the law from taking effect, and his office estimates the law will affect as many as 30,000 guns a year that are transferred from legitimate owners to prohibited people in the state.
